Clive's Comments

We do live in interesting times or at least quickly reported interesting times. It could be that when I was young the world was just as crazy but it took a long time for news and changes to spread around the world. I think both are correct. The assassination attempt on Donald Trump was crazy but it was only minutes after the shot was fired before the world was watching it unfold on their screens. Judgements on who pulled the trigger, who organised it and who was to blame were being discussed within hours.

In fact the whole US election process has become a circus. We had a Democratic proposed nominee, the sitting president, is 81 years old and showing visible signs of dementia and looks like an old man struggling with mobility. We have a Republican nominee who is 78, a past president, arrogant and unpredictable. Both are strong men with a desire to serve and an aim to make USA a strong and vibrant nation. The problem is their personalities have driven a wedge across the US with many voting 'against someone' instead of 'voting for someone' based on the personalities of the candidates.

We were in France when the results of the European elections came through and Macron called a French election. Like the European election, round one of the of the French resulted in a large swing to the right. France has a first past the post meaning that a party can win a seat with only a few votes if there are a large number of candidates. It also means that if several candidates appeal to the same group of...

After the French first round the left parties, who often do not get on, joined together to form a loose 'coalition' and agreed to only run one candidate between them in each seat. What ended up is the votes being split into three. One third to the sitting party of Macron, one third to the right party and one third to the coalition of left parties. France now has a minority government made up of parties that don't normally agree. There are going to be some real issues of unity in the next few years.

What fascinated me, and it happens here to some extent was that the left wing supporters were 'angry' that the public voted for the right. Violent demonstrations erupted on the streets. Shops were looted, cars destroyed and police attacked. People rioted in the street and were so aggressive at the voters who dared to vote right. The media were of similar opinion and couldn't understand why many member nations of EU moved to the right and were stunned at the size of the French swing. What shocked me was not the swing but the fact that the commentary and the protesters were not questioning why. Nor were they interested in looking at what the current leadership had done wrong nor what the leftist parties were doing that the community didn't like. They were 'blaming' the voters.

In Australian politics we can have big swings in either direction and when they occur there is a lot of navel gazing as to what the losing party had done wrong. We never 'blame' the winning party but what I am seeing in European politics and in some extent in USA is an arrogance of 'how dare you not vote for us!' In USA I know many people who vote for Trump but are scared to be open about it for fear of personal derision or attack. The leftist groups in France were angry and if you don't vote for us next time there will more riots was the message.

I find this the complete opposite of what democracy is really about. Free speech is not the right to have some determine what others can or can't say. It is the right to say whatever you believe provided it is not inciting others to violence. I have always had my personal beliefs and philosophies and when I was in my late teens I was a way to the left. Over the years my opinions have moved to the right and am now more conservative. I still have empathies with many social views and am supportive of many environmental movements but I also have a greater understanding of balance. I can see that we must allow all sectors of our community to flourish.

Personally I am willing to accept everyone's view point. Be they be extreme right to extreme left or even orthodox religious they all have the right to have these beliefs. Also if I had grown up in their world I may be just like them. We are the result of our genes, our parents and the world around us. We need to understand the philosophies of those in our communities. To do this we must allow all to speak. When we do we may change our opinions or we may change theirs or we may meet in the middle.

Sort of like the conflict between passionate native growers and keen growers of exotic perennials. Both plant groups are attractive, useful and have a place in the modern garden. Indeed we need to stop separating plants into native and exotic but group them in growing styles, flowering time, size and climatic limitations. As a gardener there is minimal challenge to grow local indigenous plants. The challenge is to grow plants that would normally not grow locally. It is this challenge that generates passionate gardeners and promotes a greater understanding of botany and biology. Local councils should grow indigenous plants as they would use less resources (ie rates) so enabling them to manage the shire better. Good luck for the spring growing season and don't be adverse to challenge the politics of all the plants you choose to grow.
